

Dr. Sam Bakri and Seth Moulton founded Eastern Healthcare Partners on January 1, 2011, in order to address the growing financial and health burden of non-communicable diseases around the world.

We believe the private sector can play a value-adding role to healthcare by addressing these issues in a cost-effective manner. Good management, standardized processes, and shared best practices will help both lower the costs of healthcare and increase the quality of care.

We work with world-renowned institutions to build centers of healthcare excellence in the US and then export 'focus factories' around the world to rapidly and efficiently diminish the impact of the most serious healthcare challenges affecting the world today.
